~~(c)~~ SIGNIFICANCE: Hua belongs to the second generation of Chinese communist officials who have been career party functionaries. Not a theoretician, he has risen to prominence by presenting himself as a faithful follower of Mao Zedong; an emulator of Zhou Enlai; a proficient interpreter of policy; and a competent administrator.

A longtime specialist in agricultural affairs and, to a lesser extent, public security work, Hua has little background in foreign policy matters and military affairs. Although he is constitutionally Commander in Chief of China's armed forces, Hua has not taken an active role in military affairs. He is pursuing the pragmatic policies promoted by Zhou Enlai and Deng Xiaoping and is apparently willing to let those more knowledgeable than himself exercise their expertise and provide guidance.

~~(c)~~ POLITICS: In contrast to the deification of Mao, Hua's regime has emphasized collective leadership. The relationship between Hua and Deng Xiaoping has apparently coalesced. Both appear to be functioning well, and even amicably, in their respective roles. Although Hua's control over the government is probably growing stronger, he surely realizes he lacks the wide-based civil and military support commanded by Deng. Deng has become a symbol for the popular modernization programs currently being pursued. Hua began to reinstitute many of these programs after he assumed the chairmanship in October 1976. Apparently, both men agree on the general direction of China's economic and military development and, it seems likely, they are working in tandem. While the forceful Deng provides the leadership needed to achieve interim modernization goals, Hua will have the chance to develop his own skills, consolidate his base of support, and provide the stability necessary for China to achieve its long-range modernization objectives.
